If an independent planning consultant recommended it be declared unavailable for development I think that should be the case. I remember the panic when a house burnt to the ground in that area and people in white coats closed off the pathways so it seems unwise to disturb the ground if the toxins are not oozing out at the moment. I don't know if this could change in future due perhaps to wetter climate or landside into the burn or a deep-rooted tree blowing over and exposing contaminated land. I don't think there is enough money available to do a good job of removing the dangerous waste these days and where would it go anyway.
